What you see isn't the full Truth

Group Members: Isabella Duque, Tea Cuturilo, Lucia Villalonga, Kennedy Vital, Cybelle

Target Audience and Campaign Objectives

Our persuasive campaign is about raising awareness of the negative effects fast fashion has. We will create three posters (visual representations) of the misuse of overconsumption in clothes, environmental damage, and the unethical production of these. This campaign will target young women in their twenties, as they are highly influenced and vulnerable to falling for these trends. Social media norms often target this group of individuals and aim to shape girls' attitudes and beliefs, even unknowingly. By addressing these issues, the audience will reflect on how external pressures can influence daily fashion choices and encourage more conscious and sustainable purchases. Our main goal is for young women to make more informed decisions about what they wear. At the end of the day, clothes are just clothes.

Media Product Proposal

We will create a group of digital posters that follow the theme of "What your outfit hides" that can be shared and uploaded through digital platforms. They will be created using bold images to highlight the dangers of following these trends and open people's eyes to the effects of the clothing-making process. The text will be short and thoughtful, and we will use eye-catching colors to captivate the audience while inviting them to change their attitudes.

Concepts that will influence our campaign

1. This flyer will focus on accessibility theory, using images like environmental destruction (similar to examples shown in class of animals with a straw in their mouths) in order to make the negative consequences of fast fashion accessible to the mind. By creating a strong visual, we hope to leave a mark in each person's mind, hoping to influence future purchasing decisions, linking the consequences of this act with the environment. We will have a QR, so that people can share this and hopefully make the image even more accessible, encouraging wise decision-making.

2. This flyer will focus on fear appeal, applying to sustainability and ethical responsibility. Highlighting the severity of fast fashion, to be different from the poster above, we will focus on the harsh work conditions these workers face and how each purchase contributes to the continuation of this trend (susceptibility and factual evidence). Including a solution (access to sustainable brands), motivating one to remove themselves from the equation, and avoiding causing denial, but rather encouragement and reflection.

3. This flyer will focus on the social judgment theory by showing an image that falls within the audience's LOA. Sharing a relatable idea like "we all love a good deal", acknowledging this applies to a wider audience. The image could show a fashion piece only being adequate for one occasion, whilst another, simpler one being useful daily. Encouraging viewers to reflect on the need to buy fashion items vs practical/sustainable ones. Highlighting the downside of consumer trends and introducing the negative impacts, without people feeling judged or like the message is directed towards them. This increases the likelihood of the message resonating and encourages the audience to reconsider their attitudes towards fashion (falling into the audience's LOA).

Proposal #2
Target Audience and Campaign Objectives

Our persuasive campaign is about challenging beauty standards and consumer behaviors that are trending today, especially in young girls. We will create three posters (visual representations) of the misuse of Ozempic, the fear of missing out, and the risks of overconsumption in clothes. As stated above, this campaign will target young women in their twenties, as they are highly influenced and vulnerable to falling for these trends. Social media norms often target this group of individuals and aim to shape girls' attitudes and beliefs, even unknowingly. By addressing these issues, the audience will reflect on how external pressures can influence their daily choices and encourage a healthier, more normal lifestyle without external pressures and beauty standards. Our main goal is to empower young women to make more informed decisions so that they can feel more confident in their own skin and live their own lives.

Media Product Proposal

We will create a group of digital posters that follow the theme of "Twenty and Unfiltered" that can be shared and uploaded through digital platforms. They will be created using bold images to highlight the dangers of following these trends and open people's eyes to the beauty, fashion, and lifestyle standards that are portrayed online. The text will be short and thoughtful, and we will use eye-catching colors to captivate the audience while inviting them to change their attitudes.

Concepts that will influence our campaign

1. Fast Fashion: This flyer will use accessibility theory, which focuses on how easily certain ideas come to mind. The image displayed will highlight the negative consequences of fast fashion by using vivid and memorable visuals that are likely to stick with the audience. For example, an image of a building made out of clothes placed in the middle of a jungle can create a strong and memorable association. These kinds of images are designed to come easily to mind later when the audience is shopping for trending clothes. By creating a strong mental link between fast fashion and environmental harm, we increase the likelihood that these thoughts will be remembered in the future. Additionally, the other posters in the campaign will reinforce this theme, and sharing the content can further increase exposure. This helps encourage young women to make more conscious and ethical decisions.

2. Ozempic Misuse: This flyer will focus on a fear appeal, emphasizing the serious health risks and side effects of using Ozempic for non-medical weight loss. While being "skinny" may be trending, this campaign highlights that it is not necessarily healthy and can be dangerous. The flyer will show the physical effects of misusing the drug while promoting a more realistic and healthy view of the body, challenging harmful social media stereotypes and trends. The message "skinny doesn't mean healthy" will be central in the design. By presenting both the risks and a healthier alternative perspective, the flyer aims to encourage attitude change without causing denial or avoidance, instead motivating viewers to make safer and more informed decisions. A solution (nutritionist, gym locations) will be provided.

3. FOMO: This flyer will focus on social judgment theory by presenting a message that falls within the audience's latitude of acceptance (LOA). The design will show a relatable scene, such as a group at a party where everyone is on their phones, paired with a headline like, "We've all felt like we're missing out." This approach allows the audience to connect with the message without feeling judged or criticized (triggering resistance). The flyer will then shift perspective by asking a question such as, "Is it really worth it?", encouraging viewers to reflect on their own experiences. Additional elements, like small images or "bubbles" showing next-day consequences (ex, feeling unwell or tired), can highlight the downsides. By keeping the message relatable and not overly confrontational, the flyer avoids falling into the latitude of rejection (LOR) and instead encourages the audience to reconsider their attitudes toward FOMO.

